Time, swiftly flying, not alone doth seize The meadow's blossoms and the forest's leaves, The radiant freshness and the power of youth, Its direst spoil is in the world of thought. What once was fair or noble, rich or good, Worthy of any toil or any pain, Is now revealed so colourless and pale, Hollow and void as were we void ourselves. But still 'tis well with us, whenever the spark Within the ember gleams, and when the heart Whilom deceived, unquenched glows fresh again. This very glow itself in fact is truth, The picture higher than the subject's self, More real the semblance than reality. Who sees the truth, has really known to live, For life is like the stage, for here as there, The curtain drops when the illusion fails. SCHILDEIS. A Fragment. The Bohemian Forest. In the background the Castle of Schildeis. Enter Duke Eginhaed, The Duchess, Dietwald a Knight, and a Hermit. HERMIT. See Castle Schildeis lies below us, there! All buried in the forest's inmost depths. DIETWALD [to the Duke]. That is the castle, which I said would yield The surest refuge from the fiercest foe. I could not even myself have found it now, For all the tracks and paths are overgrown. Since my late lord the Duke has hunted here, Full five and twenty years have circled by. Duke (to the Hermit). Receive, my pious brother,...
